

Douglas Huebler's Variable Piece #4, New York City, May 1969 was presented on the SOFTWARE exhibition in the Jewish Museum in New York in 1970. Visitors were able to deposit a secret and receive one submitted a day early. Collected materials were published as Variable Piece 4 SECRETS in 1973 or/and 1977 and a PDF version was published online in 2002 by the Ubu website. As Printed Matters Inc. description says the book is "a collection of confessions, [what] people do - or say they do - when no one is looking." I did recreate Huebler's work on the Internet in 2011 setting up a web page with a text box you can fill in, press the "send" button and the text was coming to me as an e-mail. On the web page random secret previously submitted was screened as a gift and the project went for about year and a half. Not everything sent in was a secret, some words looked like a random interaction with the web page, those were omitted from further processing. Original publication (and Ubu edition) is a collection of sentences on white pages, each of them equally important, every secret like a grain precisely sown into the field of the concept. I like that but there is no point or rather there is no fun in repeating the previous version. For me each secret has own character, graph, vibe, luminosity, position in the field, each forms connections with few another and all of them can be reconfigured in many ways. And this angle on the collection became an impulse: to use those secrets or just few selected to visualise possibilities in various media: e-books, drawings, prints and printed books. Therefore what you are just seeing is a fragment.
